Sigrún G., 68

Master Knitter · Owner

knits three sweaters a month herself, chooses every skein, recognises every regular.

Helga Ó., 34

Shop Host · part-time

runs the till, wraps sweaters, teaches the Saturday knit-circle.

Björn H., 51

Wool Sourcing Advisor

visits the farms in West Iceland, negotiates spring fleece, one Zoom per month.

Anna, 38 · local

second-time visitor

left her old sweater at her mother's and is replacing it with one in indigo.

Kenta, 29 · tourist

from Tokyo

bought one as a travel memento, asks Helga to wrap it like a gift.

Margret, 71 · regular

knitter

buys raw wool + patterns, returns to show off the finished pieces.

Monthly letter

One essay on an Icelandic sheep farm, one free knitting pattern, no emojis, unsubscribe in one click.

Instagram · slow

One photograph a week. Captions in lower-case. Never reels, never promo grids.

Knit-circle · Saturdays

Free two-hour drop-in session, tea + biscuits, owners welcome non-buyers.

Farm collabs

We name the farmer on every sweater tag. Every six months, we invite one to the shop.

wool supply drops after a hard lambing

we contract two alternate farms 12 months ahead, hold a 3-month buffer of raw roving, and offer repair-a-sweater service instead of new sales.

summer is slow

summer is for tourists: we switch to lighter-weight wool hats, kids' pieces, and pre-order winter sweaters with a September deposit.

a cheap copy opens in the harbour

the provenance wins: every LOPI sweater is numbered, signed, farm-sourced, hand-knit in Iceland — we publish the knitter's log.

Fast-fashion moved almost everything cheap. One small room that still counts stitches by the window is the opposite argument. Iceland has been making Lopi for a hundred years. It is not a trend. It is a return.
